WEATHER OF CONCERN

Weather of Concern

- Heavier showers may contain small hail in the North Coast from Friday afternoon through Saturday morning. Generally 1/2" to 1" is forecast for most urban spots with 1-3" for our coastal ranges. Scattered showers and small hail possible on Saturday, and snow accumulation above 3500 feet is possible Saturday morning. Drier conditions are expected by Christmas Day, and dry weather may continue into early next week.
- Tonight through tomorrow, a winter storm will bring widespread, and heavy at times, precipitation. Heavy snow will be possible in the mountains above roughly 5000 feet, with lighter snow and less accumulation down to around 3000 feet. There will be a potential for flooding, especially near recent wildfire burn scars.

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

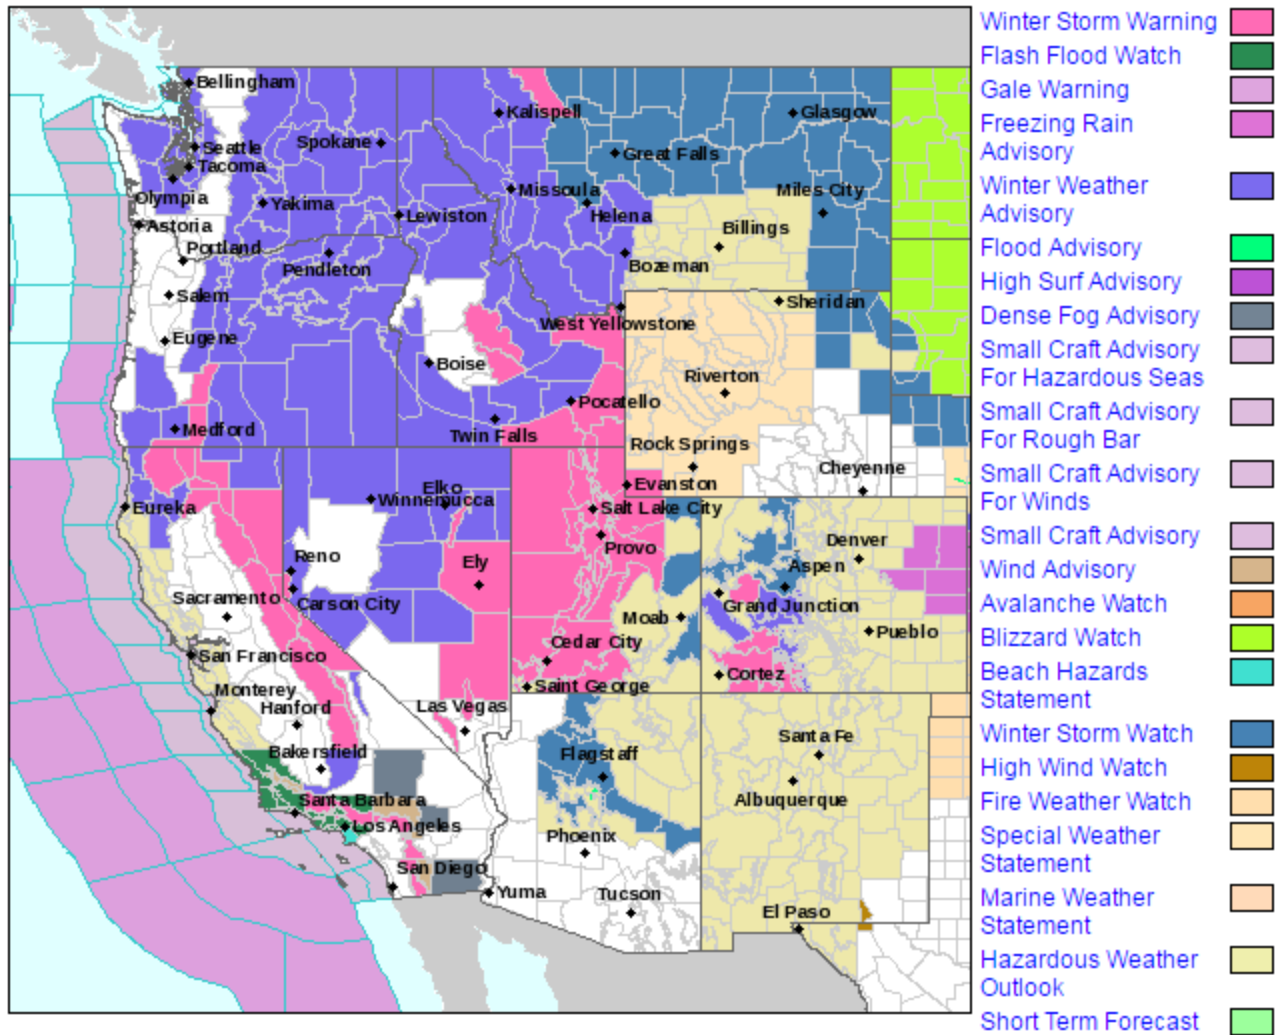

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

A moderately strong Pacific frontal system has begun moving into the northwest corner of the state this morning. Precipitation is currently falling northwest of about Chico and radar estimates are showing pockets of heavy rain embedded within the initial rain band. Winds have been running somewhat weaker than predicted by the model guidance and based on this and current and predicted surface gradients, have dropped wind speeds a bit for today. Snow levels based on current surface observations are around 3500 feet over Shasta County and in line with current forecast package. Other than wind speeds for today, made only minor adjustments to the forecast grids and will leave current winter storm warning as is. Models remain fairly consistent on timing of main frontal passage moving it into the Sacramento area around early afternoon and then on into the Sierra late this afternoon and early evening. Cold air pushing in behind the front this afternoon will bring cooler temperatures today with daytime highs dropping to below normal for this time of year. Cold air filtering in to the region will bring a continued drop in snow levels tonight with Shasta county possibly seeing snow down to the 2000 foot level by morning. Upper low will bring continued showers over the Sierra on Saturday. Snow levels will be low enough to bring snow down into the Sierra Foothills but snow amounts will be declining there as well on Saturday. By Saturday evening, snow amounts become insignificant. Partial clearing over the valley and cold air mass will make for a chilly night in the valley with lows down around freezing or a little lower. Sunday looks dry at this time under upper ridging along the west coast but cool air mass in place will keep daytime highs below normal. Models now becoming fairly consistent in keeping an upper low offshore on Monday so early next week remains dry with daytime highs warming slightly.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

A deep moist layer remains entrenched across Southern California with some light precipitation possible today mainly along and west of the mountains with areas of fog in the deserts early this morning. A cold low pressure system from the northwest is expected to bring heavy precipitation tonight with scattered showers continuing Saturday and ending from the northwest Saturday night. There will also be periods of strong gusty west winds for this afternoon into Saturday night, strongest in the mountains and deserts. Cool for Christmas. For next week, a weak low pressure system from the southwest may move into Southern California some time next week bringing more clouds and showers as early as late Monday or as late as Friday or Saturday. Otherwise generally fair weather with seasonal temperatures for next week.
